

1 Title

Since 1973, the U.S. has run a U.N. Sustainable Development Goals and a U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition (SODC) Interim Framework. The U.N. Sustainable Development Goals, the U.N. Sustainable Development Bank Compact and the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition member States are a set of international agreements that engage the U.N. in all stages of development. The U.N. promotes and enforces the principle of universal inclusion in the development management and production sectors. In the years since the U.N. was established, U.N. Member States have applied for, ratified and ratified the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition in order to promote the development of a more equitable and sustainable world. In the early 1990s, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals and U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition concluded a three-year period of intensive and ongoing negotiations to participate in the Global Food Crisis and the development of a sustainable and just world. In the early 1990s, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition led a comprehensive United Nations-led multilateral review and enhanced U.N. support for the U.N. Agenda 21 and the U.N. Agenda 2030. In March 2011, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In the same year, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in Geneva to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2012, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2015, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2016, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2017, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2018, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2019, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2020, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and technology in all its forms, including those associated with the right to life, human rights and basic freedoms. In 2021, the U.N. Sustainable Development Goals-Coalition met in New York to reaffirm the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the need to promote equality of opportunity, development, science and
